Jessica: Carolynn and I are here today with Kashish Gupta of High Touch who went through YC in summer of twenty nineteen. Welcome. Welcome.
\(00:00:00\)

Kashish: Thanks for having me.
\(00:00:10\)

Jessica: It's really nice to meet you. I have never met you.
\(00:00:11\)

Kashish: Good to meet you as well. I've heard so much about you both.
\(00:00:13\)

Jessica: Well, thank you for coming on our special series today. We are here at the Y Combinator Founder Mode retreat. And so we're talking to founders a little bit about their experiences with Founder Mode. But first, we'd love to hear more about what your company does.
\(00:00:15\)

Kashish: Hi Touch is a data and AI platform for marketers. So we help marketers do two things. We help them access their customer data and run any advertising or life cycle marketing campaign using their customer data. And two is we help them deploy AI agents that can help them more intelligently run those marketing campaigns, and build those campaigns from scratch. So we're now building agents that can help you write content that's highly personalized for your customers so that you can write a basketball campaign that's very different from your tennis campaign, and then send those to people that are specifically interested in those two topics.
\(00:00:34\)

Carolynn: Oh, wow. Like that happens to me on the daily. Very targeted advertising.
\(00:01:07\)

Kashish: Probably getting a lot of that marketing from us. Probably. Brands that use high touch.
\(00:01:12\)

Jessica: Yeah. Yeah. Who are some of your big clients?
\(00:01:16\)

Kashish: Yeah. So we work with, several, like, large b to c brands primarily, usually companies like PetSmart, Spotify, Men's Wearhouse, these kinds of brands.
\(00:01:18\)

Jessica: Oh, wow.
\(00:01:26\)

Kashish: And, we've always been enterprise focused. So in the early days, like, we kind of did discovery on smaller and bigger companies. Everyone said sell to smaller companies because it's easier. Yeah. And we just decided not to because we found out that our product market fit based on the product that we were building was, like, strictly better for enterprise.
\(00:01:26\)

Carolynn: Wait. People told you to sell to small businesses?
\(00:01:44\)

Kashish: Yeah. Because they including Y Combinator.
\(00:01:46\)

Carolynn: Really? Yeah. Because this cycle was gonna be shorter. So it's like, oh, get a few wins and then, like, graduate up to the big enterprises.
\(00:01:48\)

Kashish: Easier to get feedback. Exactly.
\(00:01:55\)

Carolynn: Easier to test and evolve and all. So then you're like, nope. We're gonna go for the big guns right away.
\(00:01:57\)

Kashish: And it was a unique scenario. I would say the feedback is still probably great for most founders. Yeah. But for us, our architecture was one that was perfectly suited for enterprise and didn't make that much sense for smaller businesses.
\(00:02:01\)

Jessica: And so you just went with your gut and said no.
\(00:02:11\)

Kashish: That's what the customers were telling us. We basically only listen to customers no matter who tells us what.
\(00:02:13\)

Jessica: Wow. It. Maybe that's sort of founder mode lesson. First lesson
\(00:02:19\)

Kashish: Is I think most founder mode founders do this. Yeah. Like, if the customer didn't say something, it's just not true until the customer says it. And even when I try to pitch my cofounders on something, they'll tell me, did the customer say that, is that your thoughts, Kashish? Oh.
\(00:02:23\)

And if it's my idea, then it doesn't count until the customer says

Carolynn: Wow. You guys are, like, intense about the customer centricness.
\(00:02:37\)

Kashish: Yeah. Sometimes it's very harsh.
\(00:02:41\)

Jessica: How did you guys get started?
\(00:02:43\)

Kashish: Sure. So, we originally were a travel business. That's what we did Y Combinator within 2019.
\(00:02:45\)

Jessica: No kidding. Yeah.
\(00:02:50\)

Kashish: Really? Basically, chat GPT for travel. You would just message us, and we would use natural language processing at the time before, you know, GPT models existed to book your travel.
\(00:02:51\)

Carolynn: Okay.
\(00:02:59\)

Kashish: COVID happened. We decided it didn't make any sense to travel
\(00:03:00\)

Carolynn: No. It was traveling.
\(00:03:03\)

Kashish: Following exactly, in the following year. And so then we were pivoting. We did a bunch of different business ideas, and every single time we asked our customers, do you want this product? They always said yes. Then we always ask them other questions like, well, what are your top priorities other than this?
\(00:03:03\)

And then they would just suddenly relax and tell us all their important priorities that were not what we Carolynn: Were doing. When you say customers, like, I'm thinking, like, these were people doing travel. Like, who are the customers you're referring to in this scenario?

\(00:03:22\)

Kashish: These were completely new folks.
\(00:03:27\)

The Social Radars

Founder Mode: Kashish Gupta, Co-CEO, Hightouch Released September 12, 2025

Carolynn: \(00:03:28\) Okay. So you have an idea. You'd have customers. You'd run this by them, and then they would actually give you, like, really good information.

Kashish: \(00:03:36\) Exactly. Okay. If you ask them the right questions.

Jessica: \(00:03:39\) Right.

Kashish: \(00:03:39\) If you push them to, like, tell the tell you their honest truth about what is truly most important to them. So long story short, we eventually came to this idea that was, helping companies use their data in sales and marketing. What we found is that there was actually a huge gap between I have data, and I can now actually use it in production sales and marketing. And that in the enterprise, that gap was way larger because people were using data warehouses like Snowflake and Databricks as their database. And so we actually, two of my cofounders used to work at a different YC company called Segment.

We Really? Exactly.

Jessica: \(00:04:13\) No way. Two of the Segment guys or your cofounders?

Kashish: \(00:04:16\) So they're engineers on the Segment team. Two of the Segment

Jessica: \(00:04:19\) Okay.

Kashish: \(00:04:20\) Got the Segment cofounders did eventually invest in High Touch. But, yeah, these are early engineers at Segment. And what we thought is that Segment actually solved all these data problems. When we went to enterprise, we found that it did not. And so that is why we felt like our product market fit was specifically for enterprise because we found out that the segment paradigm, which was send me all your data, I'll organize it for you, and I'll help you in marketing with it, broke an enterprise.

And enterprise people wanted to bring their own database, and that was our core innovation. We decided we'll help you bring your own database

Carolynn: \(00:04:48\) Yeah.

The Social Radars

Kashish: And we'll make all your SaaS tools, all 100 of them reflect that database.
\(00:04:48\)

Carolynn: This is a really noob question, but you're a big business. You have all this data. Why is it so hard to connect your sales and marketing team with your big data where like, with all your data? Like, why is that connection not just easy?

Kashish: I think there's, two main reasons. One is you have so much data. You have to help people understand, like, what the right data is. Can they use it? Is it, like, governed well?

Like, all the kind of, like, enterprise, like, red tape that goes around data usage. Uh-huh. And the second is when you wanna actually get something done, like, I wanna run an ad campaign, there's no tooling that exists for that. So we just found this really surprising gap in the market that there was just no tool between the database and the marketing platforms. And, actually, the marketing platforms didn't want there to be because they wanted to own the data.

And so we just said, we're gonna break that. We're gonna be the only SaaS tool that does not store any data, and we still, to this day, do not store any data. Like, we just have no database.

Jessica: Oh, wow. How interesting. So how big are you now?
\(00:05:46\)

Kashish: We're about 250 people. Okay. We are maybe, you call it, like, 2,000 or 3,000 customers, approximately, and we work with probably, call it, 25 of the Fortune 500.

Carolynn: Nice. Just let's go back to the timeline really quickly. You're you obviously had your COVID trough of sorrow, and then you started talking to, you know, the customers. What was your, like, your big year? Like, when did you figure you've discovered this gap?

Like, what was the year things really started humming?

Kashish: We've somewhat, like, kind of redefined the company every two years. Wow. So I would say every two years, we have a huge surge of demand because we launch a new product that's, like, extremely interesting. Mhmm. So we went from this data connections product to a UI that marketers love.

The Social Radars

Founder Mode: Kashish Gupta, Co-CEO, Hightouch

Released September 12, 2025

That caused a lot more demand. Like, folks like PetSmart and Warner Music, they love this UI, they use it every single day. Then we launched an AI decisioning product that uses reinforcement learning to choose the best marketing on a per customer basis. That's probably why you're getting so many text messages because people are just sending all their texts to all their customers. Yeah.

Mhmm. We decide the best message for every customer. And so we can send you less messages, like one a week, but it's actually relevant.

Carolynn: But they're much better messages. Much more targeted.
\(00:06:56\)

Kashish: Yeah. So, like, almost every B2C brand is, how do I reduce the number of messages, reduce unsubscribes, and increase actual engagement? That's, our job now.
\(00:06:58\)

Carolynn: So you guys look like a stair step. You're not like a smooth curve. You just keep iterating \(00:07:06\) Yeah. Exactly. Iterating, changing, and getting more and more successful.

Kashish: Exactly.
\(00:07:13\)

Jessica: That's fascinating. Carolynn and I are collecting a little data on Founder Mode, like, what it means in practice Mhmm. Besides just the definition of it. Can you tell us along this your journey? Have you ever had to go into Founder Mode or when you've used some of the principles?
\(00:07:13\)

Kashish: So I love this concept, and I'm happy to kinda share my take on what it means. Mhmm. And I've actually kind of shared this now with our whole exec team and all of our sales leaders as well that there will be times where they see me or my cofounders practicing founder mode and to expect it to happen, to, like, be engaged and excited by it rather than scared.
\(00:07:30\)

Jessica: Oh, wow. That's a nice warning. Yes. It's like Just a warning.
\(00:07:48\)

Kashish: And I think this is, like, just a good lesson for a lot of founders. Like, if you tell people that you're gonna do something in advance, then when you do it, they're not surprised. They don't think you're acting out of character. They don't think you're mad at them. They're like, oh, he said he would do this, and now he is.
\(00:07:52\)

The Social Radars

Founder Mode: Kashish Gupta, Co-CEO, Hightouch Released September 12, 2025

Jessica: Yeah. Yes.
\(00:08:03\)

Kashish: So I know why this is happening.
\(00:08:04\)

Jessica: You're not breaking character.
\(00:08:05\)

Kashish: Yeah. Exactly. Yeah. So you ask for permission in advance, and it gives you so much more credit afterwards to actually practice that. Yeah.
\(00:08:06\)

So I was taught something a long time ago that was really difficult for me to internalize, but it was like, what is the job of a CEO? And, ultimately, what I was taught is that the job of a CEO is to make a company successful, and it is, unfortunately, not to make everyone around them happy.

Jessica: That's true. That is
\(00:08:28\)

Kashish: True. And I struggle with this so much in the early days because I would try to, like, listen to everyone around me, like, agree like, take their feedback, like, do the things that they thought should be done.
\(00:08:30\)

Carolynn: Consensus building.
\(00:08:40\)

Kashish: Right. And in a relatively democratic way. Yeah. That is a terrible way to lead a company. I think I became a significantly better cofounder and co CEO later on around, like, call, like, really 2024, to be honest, very candidly Mhmm.
\(00:08:41\)

When I stopped negotiating. So people would say, oh, but, like, let's not do that. Let's do, like, a version of that. But you as a founder have so much conviction in the thing that you should actually just take full kind of, like, go ahead on, like, let's actually do this the right way rather than some compromise type of way. So my definition of founder mode is basically your job is to provide results or to make the company successful.

And the people that are there for the vision or the mission of the company will always prefer that versus you saying yes to them, making them happy, even providing the mentorship or career growth. Like, they will always sacrifice some of those things for you making the decisions that make the company successful.

- Carolynn: \(00:09:33\) Yeah. You know, it's funny. So, you know, sometimes we go into parent mode when we're on this podcast.
- Jessica: \(00:09:38\) Yes. We do.
- Carolynn: \(00:09:38\) And this what you're saying reminds me of this there's a psychology that, like, children actually feel better when their parents are more strict because the boundaries actually make them feel safe. This is a little I don't know. It's not exactly comparable, but that's what I'm in my head. I'm thinking, like, maybe that translates to the workplace.
- Jessica: \(00:09:54\) I have to admit what I was thinking is this idea of breaking character with my kids. Like, I always tried it was bad if you, like, lost it and acted crazy because you're breaking character of mom. You know?
- Carolynn: \(00:10:07\) Yeah.
- Jessica: \(00:10:07\) Yeah. And so we both went to our parenting mode.
- Kashish: \(00:10:10\) Was hilarious.
- Carolynn: \(00:10:11\) It's metaphor for everything.
- Jessica: \(00:10:12\) Yeah. It's good advice.
- Kashish: \(00:10:14\) Yeah. And I think, like, a lot of people, for example, will hire executives to have significantly more experience than them. That person should be better than you at that domain, and they are actually. But you have perspective both from all the other parts of the company as well as from the market and from the customer.
- Jessica: \(00:10:29\) Is it hard to reconcile that, though? This person might have more experience in x, but you want them to listen to you.
- Kashish: \(00:10:36\) So difficult. Yeah. Especially when you're, like, often the youngest person in the room.

Carolynn:
\(00:10:40\)

Right. Yes.

Kashish:
\(00:10:40\)

But I think, like, embracing the fact that, like, you have perspective on the market and the customer is what helps. Because you eventually realize that as a CEO of a business, you're always gonna have more context than everyone else. So there if you're feeling something, there's probably a reason why, and you owe it to yourself to sit down and think and write until you eventually identify. Why was I so strongly held to a certain way of doing things? Is it because I'm resistant to change or because there's actual customer context that enforces why this should be done this way?

Jessica:
\(00:11:09\)

Do you do a lot of writing to help you think?

Kashish:
\(00:11:12\)

Yeah. So that is, I guess, what I learned in the last couple years. I write almost every hour of every day. Wow. So I'm not always journaling, but pretty much every thought I have, I write down.

Jessica:
\(00:11:20\)

How much of it do you share?

Kashish:
\(00:11:22\)

I try to share everything that is left that is still true by the end the week. So, like

Jessica:
\(00:11:29\)

That is quite a process.

Kashish:
\(00:11:30\)

You know, like, everyone has, like, volatility. Right? You might lose conviction and gain conviction throughout a week. Yeah. By the end of the week or even end of the day, if something is still there and you're still quite sure about it, that is when I start feeling uncomfortable if other people don't know.

So another thing I was taught, if there's anything that you know that you've not told other people in your company, especially your executives or, like, your leadership, then, like, you're basically not doing your job or you're lying because you're hiding information from them. And if you kind of figure something out or your intuition is kinda leading you somewhere, you owe it to them to share that information as soon as possible.

Carolynn:
\(00:12:03\)

And for you, that timeline is a week. Like, you give yourself a week. Ideally. And if you're still thinking about it, it's time to disclose.

Kashish: Ideally.
\(00:12:10\)

Carolynn: Okay.
\(00:12:10\)

Kashish: And, like, you think, like, people will be, like, scared because they're they're getting information about this, like, like, maybe it's, like, negative stuff. Yeah. No. They're actually quite happy because they sensed it too. If you hire good people, they almost always sense it too.

Interesting. That's when they start speaking up and be like, oh, I'm feeling this as well. Let's solve it together. Yeah. I have a, like, a leadership coach, and his name is David Clements.

He's taught me a lot of these things. One thing he's taught me is that the only person that can afford to be wrong in the company is ultimately the founder because they can't really get fired. I mean, it's not always true. Obviously, founders do get fired. Yeah.

But for all intents and purposes, like, most people are risk averse

Carolynn: Yes.
\(00:12:51\)

Kashish: Because they have the ability to get fired. The founder is the only person that can say, I'm gonna do the thing I need that needs to be done and take all the risk. And so what that extrapolates to is that if you're not if you're right a 100% of the time, you didn't take enough risks, which means you didn't do the job of a founder. And, like, a lot of founder mode definitions are, like, do the thing only the founder can do that no one else can do. And so in this case, I'm saying that risk is basically the only thing the founder can do uniquely that other people will struggle to take.

Jessica: Interesting. Want permission
\(00:13:19\)

Kashish: From you. Want permission. They'll tone it down. They'll take half risk.
\(00:13:20\)

Carolynn: Yes. Yeah.
\(00:13:23\)

The Social Radars

Kashish: All these are Hedge.
\(00:13:24\)

Carolynn: They'll hedge.
\(00:13:25\)

Kashish: They'll hedge. Exactly. So good examples of this is mid last year, no one really believed in us hitting our revenue plan still. And I basically said, hey. We're gonna double the sales team headcount, and I think we're not only gonna hit this year's head count, like, revenue plan, but also next year's and, like, double again.

But the numbers were not there. Yep. What I was feeling is that the market was telling me there's more demand for this product than ever and that it was gonna show up in our pipeline, like, net new, but not in our, like, metrics historically. So it's all, like, forward metrics.

Carolynn: How did you get that feeling? Is it from talking to your customers? Like, how did
\(00:13:58\)

Jessica: You know?
\(00:14:02\)

Kashish: I started managing the sales team directly. So it was, like, maybe, like, four managers and, like, 20 reps. Okay. I started working directly.

Jessica: Did you have a sales manager before?
\(00:14:09\)

Kashish: We did. We had a sales leader. We were kind of in between that sales leader and a chief revenue officer
\(00:14:11\)

Carolynn: Okay.
\(00:14:15\)

Kashish: That we were looking for. Okay. And part of learning how to hire a chief revenue officer was doing the job myself. Mhmm. Like, reading the books, managing the staff, like, learning the job.

Then as a result, talking to all those customers and realizing actually in every single team, we had under forecasted the demand, and it was actually just limited by the fact that we didn't have enough people.

Carolynn: So the risk was we're gonna spend a lot of money. Yeah. We're gonna hire a ton of people. And hiring is risky because firing is the worst.
\(00:14:34\)

Kashish: And you never wanna go through the rift.
\(00:14:40\)

Carolynn: And you don't wanna go through the rift. It's so demoralizing. So \(00:14:42\)

Kashish: I couldn't prove with data that I was right.
\(00:14:45\)

Carolynn: Right. You had nothing to back it up except your gut.
\(00:14:47\)

Jessica: Yeah. And a lot of naysayers.
\(00:14:50\)

Kashish: Oh, yeah. Only naysayers.
\(00:14:53\)

Carolynn: Okay. That's a good question. I was just gonna say, like, you said that sometimes when you have these gut feelings, other people will have sensed it and they'll be like, thank god you said it because I was playing it too. In this case, was that not true?
\(00:14:55\)

Kashish: That is a great point. Candidly, there was a of naysayers at the top. Yeah. On the ground level, there was a lot of people that strongly agreed. You talk to the reps, they're telling me I'm gonna close two to three x of quota.
\(00:15:04\)

Carolynn: Yeah. Okay.
\(00:15:15\)

Kashish: When you talk to the managers, they say, yeah. I haven't told you this yet, Kashish, but I know I'm gonna hit, like, 4,000,000 more than you think I am.

Kashish: And then so you go to the very bottom, and they have all this qualitative feedback that's not necessarily in the data where they feel very, optimistic.
\(00:15:23\)

Jessica: Oh, interesting. Wow.
\(00:15:29\)

Carolynn: That's a very good Founder Mode example.
\(00:15:32\)

Jessica: A great a very specific one.
\(00:15:34\)

Kashish: So the other one I have is, I think oftentimes, like, coordinating amongst equals is the hardest. So a lot of Founder Mode folks are like, well, ultimately, someone reports to me. I can tell them exactly what to do. Your cofounders on the on the other hand are more your equals.
\(00:15:36\)

Jessica: Right.
\(00:15:50\)

Kashish: Yeah. And so making decisions between your cofounders is probably, like, the most stressful but the most rewarding because as if you're very aligned with the cofounders, then you can just move mountains. So for us, this was, earlier this year, we were working on AI product. It was a reinforcement learning product that predominantly did not use LLMs. So you see all these other AI companies that are focused on using LLMs, and that's the main logical unit.
\(00:15:50\)

For us, it was reinforcement learning, which we thought was the correct way for marketing Yeah. Because CMOs were really scared of LLMs, and they were, like, really averse to content generation at Jessica: The time.

\(00:16:20\)

Carolynn: Scared of LLMs.
\(00:16:21\)

Kashish: All of h two last year, that was the case. I would say most of h one this year, CMOs said content gen is not ready for \(00:16:22\)

The Social Radars

Jessica: Me. Okay.
\(00:16:28\)

Kashish: And so we thought, let's use reinforcement learning to choose the best content, and we build this AI product around it. The market was pretty excited, but they were, like, adopting slowly. And so at this point, let's say our company has, like, four main products, and we have, like, 50 engineers. So we're, like, very understaffed for, like, a very large surface area. What happened is I talked to my cofounders, and I said, hey, guys.

Like, what we're doing, we're gonna double this year. We're probably gonna double next year. But, like, I think there's a much bigger opportunity, and it's kinda scary to hear, but I don't think the AI opportunity that we're working on right now is the largest opportunity. I think there's an even bigger one that no one has cracked. We have to define our own way and, like, pay our own market.

But if we do that, I think, like, we're gonna build a significantly longer lasting business. Mhmm. And the way I framed this was, actually, like, given where we are now, if us three stopped doing our job, we're still gonna double this year.

Jessica: Wow.

Kashish: And so that should give you relief and excitement on going for the moon, on, like, actually going for the largest possible opportunity. And this was it's brand new information because usually, like, we were so in the details that we didn't believe that we could actually hit our numbers without really strong involvement. But now the team is there, and the demand is there. So that was, like, a very refreshing feeling. But sharing that as the lever for what can we work on that would actually completely redefine marketing.

If you were to build a marketing team right now, given the technologies we have today Yeah. How would you build that marketing team without any biases? We started asking every single one of our customers this Yeah. And, like, the some of the best CMOs in the world, and they all said, yeah. Like, we would not be doing any of the stuff that we're doing today.

Really? Like, we're writing all these briefs. We are, like, basically just, like, stabbing at the dark for what works and doing trial and error. We would be making way more data informed decisions and let LLMs, like, look through all the campaigns, all the data Mhmm. And make decisions with us.

Oh, wow.

Kashish:
\(00:18:18\)

So then we started basically inventing that. Like, we started sitting with them saying, hey. I'll give you this product for free, but, like, work with me and develop this with me.

Carolynn:
\(00:18:25\)

Yeah. And your cofounders were aligned with you, or how much convincing did you have to do?

Kashish:
\(00:18:31\)

It took us on, honestly, like, two to three months of convincing each other.

Carolynn:
\(00:18:34\)

Interesting.

Kashish:
\(00:18:35\)

Because I didn't have, like, what to do. Yeah. None of us said what to do. It was just, like, we could do a lot more, and there is a technical shift in the market right now that no one else is gonna do because they don't have the access to marketers that we do. And so it was I think if, like, if there was a clear proposal, then it'd be like, okay.

Let's make a yes, no decision. Yeah. This was much more like, hey. Let's do something. Let's figure out together what to do.

Yeah. And it took us probably three months.

Carolynn:
\(00:18:58\)

Do have two cofounders? Yes. Okay.

Kashish:
\(00:19:00\)

So three of us total.

Jessica:
\(00:19:01\)

Yeah. Wow. Well, that was really interesting. I loved your examples. It's so interesting.

Yeah.

Carolynn:
\(00:19:08\)

The specificity is great.

Jessica:
\(00:19:09\)

Yes. We are gonna have such good information based on these interviews. So thank you
